A System Built for Liberty or for Psychopaths?

By Glenn Meder

I once traveled to Ibarra, Ecuador, high in the Andes Mountains. I enjoyed walking through the market where many vendors sell their wares, from fruit to carved jade figurines.

Markets like this are everywhere. Drive from Guayaquil to Manta in the same country and you will see people on the side of the road hawking homemade cheese. Travel up the Amazon River by canoe into the deep interior, and you will find a fish market. On the other side of the globe, walk down the streets of Buriram, Thailand, and you'll see everything imaginable for sale.

Markets transcend culture. The free market is a natural phenomenon of human nature.

We humans know we can improve our lives if we figure out how to provide what others need and will pay for at the right price point. It is through serving the needs of others that we advance ourselves and our society.

Leonard Read took this idea and ran with it in his essay "I, Pencil."

"I, Pencil" highlights the incredible power of the free market. It emphasizes how the spontaneous order of market forces allows for the efficient production of goods—like pencils—without any central planning or regulatory oversight.

Think of the lumberjacks who cut down trees in the Pacific Northwest and of the workers who mill the wood from those trees into the thin shape of a pencil. Also think of the underground miners in Sri Lanka who dig out the graphite, which is then mixed with clay from Mississippi and fired in a kiln to create "lead" for the pencils.

Did you know the pencils' erasers, likewise, are created by a complex mixture of products sourced from all over—from Indonesia to Italy? It's true. The brass fitting that holds the eraser in place comes from zinc mines in such countries as India or Australia, and the zinc is mixed with nickel from nickel mines in, say, The Philippines or Indonesia or Madagascar.

But none of these components could be brought together and turned into pencils without the thousands of people who make the railroad ties and the rails and the spikes and the train engines that transport the raw materials and the mining equipment that extracts the minerals and metals from the earth. The train engines and mining equipment are fueled by diesel, which is itself mined and re-

FROM THE EDITOR

As you know, Liberty Zeppelin's main theme is liberty and freedom. Usually this refers to political freedom, but today I want to talk about mental and emotional freedom. Specifically, I want to talk about this formula: discipline + detachment = freedom.

I'll explain what I mean with two stories.

The first one involves a dog named Angie. She belongs to a friend, but I've been walking her recently because, although she's a sweet girl, she's out of control. When you take her for a walk, she is constantly agitated and high-strung. When she sees other dogs, she loses it: She barks wildly, pulls hard, and generally wreaks havoc. Not only is it embarrassing, but my wife (the ultimate dog lover) refuses to walk Angie alone because she's not strong enough to restrain her.

Angie's lack of discipline resulted in her lack of freedom and lack of enjoyment in life. She wasn't able to experience the outdoors as much because her owners didn't enjoy taking her for walks. She couldn't enjoy the company of other dogs or the love that she would get from my wife were she able to control the hyperactive pup. Not only was Angie's life worse for her lack of discipline, but she'd become an emotional and physical burden to those around her.

Compare this scenario with a well-trained, well-behaved dog who is a pleasure to be around; a dog who does not get agitated and stays calm; a dog who does not pull or lose control. Such a dog would be walked more, would be invited to join her owner on car rides and on trips to the park and to other people's homes. A highly disciplined dog might even be able to walk without a leash and run off-leash in the park. Indeed, disciplined dogs are happier dogs, and they make those around them happier.

I'll update you on Angie after I tell you the second story.

When my son was ten or eleven, I took him to see Iron Man. While we were sitting in the theater waiting for the movie to start, I decided to impart a life lesson. I told him that at some point during the movie I would tap him on his knee and when I did so I wanted him to "pop" out of the movie—to look around at his surroundings and the other theatergoers and notice how they were totally entranced by the movie. Once he did this, he was free to "pop" back into the movie and lose himself in the moment again.

My goal was to teach him how to detach from the moment—in this case, how to snap out of the trance-like emotions evoked by the drama of the movie. When you develop the ability to detach in this way, I told him, you can see the world objectively. You can see through the deceptions and the propaganda that are designed to trap you. Consequently, you gain power over your emotional response to whatever is being presented to you.

Over the years, my son became very skilled at this talent. Once, when he was quite young, he was very frustrated with a violin lesson. First, I told him to feel what he needed to feel. What I meant was that he needn't ignore his emotions in the effort to control them. Then, when he was done feeling frustrated, he should snap out of that state. As soon as I said this, he immediately stopped his outburst. I was actually amazed at how fast he was able to rein in his emotions.

So, what can we learn from both these stories?

I see the tale of out-of-control Angie as a perfect metaphor for an out-of-control human mind. We've all known people who are emotional train wrecks, haven't we? They overreact to everything that happens to them. They have huge highs and deep lows. They often fly off the handle or are agitated and nervous. Not only are they miserable, but they cause considerable collateral damage to anyone and everyone around them.

Now for the update. This past week I have been patiently training Angie. I realized that the first thing I had to do during our walks was to eliminate her agitation. To achieve this, I had to have her find her place—that is, slightly behind me on my left. I needed her to pay attention to me and follow my lead.

So, as we walk, I change directions at random times.

I'll quickly turn to the right or to the left or do a 180. She is learning that she needs to be ready to instantly respond to my lead at all times, no matter how haphazard my direction and abrupt my turns.

I offer her constant feedback, so she knows whether she is responding properly or not. When she does it right, I praise her and give her a treat. When she loses control, I don't scold her. I simply distract her, change direction on a dime, and help her regain her focus on keeping her place at my side.

After Angie got acclimated to this method of walking, we began approaching other dogs instead of avoiding them. I knew we needed such challenging situations so we could address her issues head-on.

Similarly, this kind of training is how I can gain control of my own mind and emotions. But discipline is more than just willpower—more than just willing yourself to act a certain way. Instead, the key to discipline is detachment. By detaching from the drama of the moment, as I taught my son to do at the movies (and in other situations after that), I'm able to think objectively. Just as I have had to remind Angie of her proper place, remembering to detach allows me to put my mind in its place. I'm the one in control; my emotions aren't.

In the same way, I do not allow others to control me through propaganda. I want to be able to observe what influences are affecting me. I value being able to determine what I am identifying with at any moment. I need to be able to instantly change my perspective. This "snapping out of it" is the single most important skill that any of us can have in order to control our emotions.

Just as a well-trained dog feels more secure and is thus happier, the same is true of a disciplined mind. A disciplined mind is at peace; it can handle whatever it encounters with grace; it is not easily fooled by propaganda. When we have a disciplined mind, we are able to endure trials and help others endure them. We are able to experience joy and love. Our lives improve.

My training with Angie is a work in progress. I've had only a couple weeks with her, but already she is much calmer. She is now a pleasure to walk. Even my wife is able to take Angie for walks without fear of injuring her back.

The final thought I want to leave you with is this: Most people think discipline restricts their freedom. On the contrary, discipline is necessary for mental and emotional peace and freedom and joy!

fined by machinery that was built by still more thousands.

Indeed, the creation of a single pencil requires an intricate supply chain and the collaboration of millions of people across the globe, each contributing their specialized skills and knowledge. None of them are aware that the final product they're working on will be a pencil. They and the businesses that employ them operate in a free market, without central planning. The voluntary cooperation, coordination, and collaboration of their efforts is what Mr. Read refers to as "spontaneous order."

Spontaneous order generates tremendous innovation, which in turn provides enormous benefits to humankind. The free market of the medical system in the US, for example, has generated medical advancements that positively impact everyone around the world, even people who live in oppressive governments that allow for little innovation.

But while free markets are a natural outcome of the good in human nature, the opposite is also true.

From the beginning of time, the evil that lurks to a greater or lesser degree in all human hearts has caused a few powerful individuals and institutions to brutalize the weak.

For example, the Vikings of long ago raped, murdered and pillaged peaceful people. Mobsters in every age and locale are known to bully, rob, shut down, shoot, and "disappear" the owners of businesses who refuse to comply with their shakedowns. Financial kingpins create systems of legalized thievery in which regular people are bled dry. Tyrants routinely suppress and subjugate the masses in all sorts of ways.

These two natural systems are diametrically opposed in many ways.

In free markets, people engage in voluntary transactions with whomever they want to work. Each person is free to choose what to purchase and where to purchase it. Each can decide whom to do business with—and whom to sever ties with. These millions of daily decisions maximize competition and encourage businesses to provide the best product or service for the least amount of money—or, put another way, for the greatest profit.

Small businesses thrive in free markets with few regulations.

On the other hand, Big Business isn't a fan of free markets. Larry Fink, the BlackRock CEO who is considered the world's most powerful money manager, speaks from self-interest when he declares, "Markets like totalitarian governments." What he's saying is that tyrannical regimes don't like it when people have a choice. They don't like voluntary transactions. Rather, they want to force compliance, as we witnessed when pharmaceutical giants colluded with governments to force us to receive the jab.

Coercion is a common tactic of large corporations. For example, 3M and DuPont, both of which make water filters, support the National Sanitation Foundation (NSF) certification process for water treatment methods. They lobby local and state governments to adopt NSF certification as a requirement for all water treatment products installed in commercial and government buildings. They also convince insurance companies to cover only NSF-certified products.

Such a certification process is bureaucratic, time-consuming and expensive. Large corporations that mass-produce simple products like water filters can afford to put many hours and dollars into certification, but it's onerous for small businesses that make high-end, non-mass-produced merchandise like water distillers. In short, certification guarantees that behemoths can shut out small businesses from the market and create an uncompetitive environment.

Small business owners, as we know, are independent-minded. They think for themselves. Their size makes them nimble and able to come up with solutions that out-compete their larger rivals. In addition, small businesses are harder for governments to control than large corporations are, which is why governments prefer the latter.

We can see a clear illustration of government's preference for large businesses by looking at the planet-wide lockdowns that were imposed in the wake of the World Health Organization (WHO) pandemic declaration of March 2020. Almost overnight, small businesses in every country on earth were forced to close—sometimes temporarily, other times permanently—while Big Box stores were allowed to stay open. The mandated shutdown crushed entrepreneurs who had everything they owned invested in their businesses. This period ended up being one of the largest-ever wealth transfers from the middle class to the upper class. Some of the world's most affluent individuals almost doubled their net worth from 2020 to 2021.

An October 2021 article in Newsweek describes how this transfer happened:

"Prior to COVID, more than 30 million small businesses accounted for about half the GDP and jobs in America; the other half of the economy was concentrated in 20,000 big companies. So you might have expected that small businesses would have had an equal amount of negotiating power when the pandemic hit as big companies. You would be wrong. [ . . . ] [B]ig firms were deemed ‘essential’ and allowed to stay open during the pandemic, while small businesses were subjected to punishing lockdown orders and forced to close, in part or completely. Many of the examples were doubly infuriating given the absurd hypocrisies they presented.

“For example, big box pet retailers like PetSmart that groomed pet hair and nails were deemed essential—while salons owned by small business owners that served humans were not. The LA-area Pineapple Hill Saloon and Grill was forced to close their outdoor dining—while a movie production not only operated but hosted a catering tent serving food to crew in the same parking lot that the restaurant had been forced to abandon. Weed dispensaries, illegal just a handful of years ago in many jurisdictions, were suddenly deemed essential.

“And the results of this are fairly easy to follow: Spending that couldn’t be done at closed businesses was shifted to the ones that were open, which were by and large big businesses, many of which naturally saw a substantial increase in their revenue.

“Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve was pumping trillions of dollars into the markets, helping to inflate stock valuations. Hundreds of thousands of small businesses were murdered in just a few short months—by government edict—while seven tech companies gained $3.4 trillion in market value.”

However, the most dramatic difference between the two opposing systems—one promoting freedom, the other pushing tyranny—lies in the kind of people these systems elevate.

The free market empowers hardworking, industrious individuals. It rewards and elevates people based on merit. It rewards entrepreneurs who are problem-solvers. It rewards inventors who advance technology to get better results with less energy. And it rewards employees who are industrious, who develop new skills, and who advance the interests of their employer. The free market creates a thriving, prosperous society and lifts up all people.

Tyrannical systems, on the other hand, elevate would-be rulers and their minions who desire control over others and who put bureaucratic procedure and red tape above freedom and prosperity. Tyrannical governments elevate psychopaths and sociopaths who will do whatever to whomever in order to hold on to power and gratify their greed. Tyrannies breed crime and corruption, cripple our economy, and corrode our moral and social fabric.

We can see this happening in the United States right now. Once-beautiful cities such as Portland and San Francisco are now ugly and overrun with homelessness and rampant crime. Why? Because prosecutors are choosing to not penalize the worst criminals, including white-collar fraudsters. The result is that dangerous psychopaths are empowered, while good people become victims with no recourse to justice, and society as a whole is diminished.

In this country, we understand that our rights come from God and not from the government, which means the government does not have the authority to infringe upon our property, privacy, sovereignty, or liberty. The US Constitution codified these rights and drew a line in the sand that protects “we the people” from psychopathic, power-hungry politicians and bureaucrats.

But the Constitution is just a piece of paper if we don’t hold politicians accountable when they breach its laws. The more we allow them to violate our rights without consequence, the more they will infringe on those rights with impunity . . . and their despotic control snowballs.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), to cite one example, has gone completely off the rails. In one of the most blatant violations of the First Amendment to date, FBI officers infiltrated Twitter and other social media platforms with the stated purpose of censoring US citizens.

But the Bureau’s law-breaking, rights-trampling ways don’t end there. The FBI has begun labeling concerned parents who speak up at school meetings “domestic terrorists.” FBI agents have also engaged in entrapment. For instance, in 2020 they lured four men in Michigan into an engineered plot to kidnap the governor of that state. And in 2021 they were actively involved in the January 6th “insurrection,” where they planted a number of undercover officers in the crowd with the intent to incite a riot.

What is the motive for their madness?

They are engineering their system of tyranny right in front of our eyes, and they feel that they can do so without any consequences because no one is holding them accountable for breaching our rights and the laws of the Constitution.

The problem is only going to worsen. Here's why . . .

Governments around the world, in cooperation with the World Economic Forum (WEF), are actively rewiring every strand of our society.

First, let's look at the WEF's influence on corporations. In tandem with the United Nations, the WEF has created Environmental Social Governance (ESG) investment goals. ESG rewards corporate executives who put in place racist and transgender-friendly hiring policies.

Is ESG succeeding? Bloomberg obtained 2020 and 2021 data for eighty-eight S&P 100 companies and calculated overall job growth at those firms. These eighty-eight companies increased their US workforces in 2021 by a total of 323,094 employees, and, of these positions, 94% went to people of color!

In other words, Big Business froze out new hires based on merit and instead started hiring based on the superficial trait of skin color. An article from America First Legal gave an example:

“On December 11, 2023, James O’Keefe [then head of Project Veritas] released a recording on X of IBM Chief Executive Officer and Board Chairman Arvind Krishna. In the recording, Krishna promises to fire, demote, or deny bonuses to corporate executives who either fail to meet the corporation’s racial, national origin, and sex-based hiring quotas, or who hire too many Asian individuals. Also, Paul Cormier, the chairman of IBM subsidiary Red Hat, admits that Red Hat terminated employees who failed to meet the corporation’s unlawful racial, national origin, and sex-based quotas.”

These new hiring practices now pervade large companies. What will result from not hiring based on merit? I’ll answer by posing this question: why is Boeing suddenly experiencing a rash of mechanical problems in its airline fleet? Could it be because top management has stopped hiring people based on their skills and experience and is instead hiring based on ESG metrics? It would seem so.

All of us are familiar with the names of large companies that have been promoting the transgender agenda: Bud

Light and Jack Daniels and Target come to mind. While most people expected Bud Light management to quickly apologize for their disastrous commercial with Dylan Mulvany, they never did. Why? Because any executive who goes against the trans agenda will be blacklisted by Corporate America and unable to retain or secure a job. So, expect more depravity in the future.

The biggest change in our society will result from the introduction of Central Bank Digital Currencies (CBDCs). CBDCs represent the most fundamental shift in the monetary system in history. They will enable central banks (and probably the largest commercial banks) to track every single purchase you make. You will have no financial privacy whatsoever. In addition, CBDCs will be intertwined with the new carbon credit score that each person will receive. Each product you purchase will either positively or negatively affect your carbon credit score.

How will our controllers determine whether a product has a positive or negative impact on your carbon credit? The WEF is working with corporations to adopt a certification program. It will be much more extensive than current certification programs, such as the NSF mentioned before.

For example, it will look at every aspect of a corporation, from its own hiring practices to the hiring practices of its vendors to its social responsibility score. The latter means how the company treats its trans workers and enforces their “rights” in the workplace. Is an employee sufficiently punished if he refuses to use a fellow employee’s preferred pronouns?

In short, it will be very difficult for small businesses to get certified, and many won’t want to be certified because the requirements will go against their moral values. If you purchase products from a non-certified small business—or from any business that does not play the ESG game—your own social credit score will be negatively impacted.

Your score will also be adversely affected if you post unacceptable news or views on social media, if you write articles that refute the official narrative, and even if you get your news from approved sources or not. If you participate in misinformation or disinformation, as defined by the government, you will be punished in some form or fashion.

People with high social credit scores will get more benefits—money, opportunities, freedoms—while people with low scores will be penalized. The severity of the penalty will depend on the nature of the infraction. All in all, those who resist will have a much harder time in life.

Not only will this new system (called a kakistocracy, which literally means system of government which is run by the worst, least qualified, or most unscrupulous citizens) elevate the wrong type of people, but the psychopaths in charge will be able to choose with incredible preciseness exactly whom to elevate into their cabal. Never in history have the power-mongers had the tools they have now to build from scratch a new system organized and overseen by ill-intentioned people.

I have been trying to sound the alarm bells about how these parasites want to change our entire way of life to benefit themselves at the expense of good people. They literally want to enslave the human race, and if we don't stop this system of control they are putting in place, every aspect of our lives will be controlled by psychopaths.

You probably want to ask: What can I do to stop this?

My first answer is, "Be courageous and do whatever you can." A mother who sees that her children are in danger goes into momma bear mode and becomes fearless and unstoppable. A father who sees his daughter in danger will stop at nothing to protect her. Right now, your children are in significant danger. Now is the time to step up and protect them by whatever means possible.

Second, you MUST stop watching the corporate-controlled news. It is pure propaganda designed to make you unaware and compliant. Turn it off. And turn off talk shows. Instead, spend your free time researching independent journalists and finding out what is really happening in the world.

Third, spread the word. Educate others, whether they be friends and family or strangers, who are sometimes easier to talk to than are the people close to you. Print this newsletter out and hand it to people.

Fourth, get active in local and state elections. Freedom must be protected on the local level. We need to ensure that the United States remains decentralized—with each of the 50 states taking back their constitutional power from the federal government and from international organizations like the UN and the WHO and the WEF. The Tenth Amendment was written to limit and enumerate federal powers and protect against federal overreach. Remember, decentralization is good, centralization is bad.

For the sake of our loved ones and our future generations, we must ensure that all systems and institutions reinforce decentralization and liberty. We must totally and absolutely reject the WEF, CBDCs, Digital IDs and any restrictions on freedom of speech and of the press.

Above all, through it all, we must stay rooted in the knowledge that our rights come from God, not from government.

State Nullification: What Is It?

By Tom Woods

What is it?

State nullification is the idea that the states can and must refuse to enforce unconstitutional federal laws.

Says Who?

Says Thomas Jefferson, among other distinguished Americans. His draft of the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 first introduced the word “nullification” into American political life, and follow-up resolutions in 1799 employed Jefferson’s formulation that “nullification...is the rightful remedy” when the federal government reaches beyond its constitutional powers. In the Virginia Resolutions of 1798, James Madison said the states were “duty bound to resist” when the federal government violated the Constitution.

But Jefferson didn’t invent the idea. Federalist supporters of the Constitution at the Virginia ratifying convention of 1788 assured Virginians that they would be “exonerated” should the federal government attempt to impose “any supplementary condition” upon them – in other words, if it tried to exercise a power over and above the ones the states had delegated to it. Patrick Henry and later Jefferson himself elaborated on these safeguards that Virginians had been assured of at their ratifying convention.

What’s the Argument for It?

Here’s an extremely basic summary:

1) The states preceded the Union. The Declaration of Independence speaks of “free and independent states” that “have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do.” The British acknowledged the independence not of a single blob, but of individual states, which they proceeded to list one by one. Article II of the Articles of Confederation says the states “retain their sovereignty, freedom, and independence”; they must have enjoyed that sovereignty in the past in order for them to “retain” it in 1781 when the Articles were officially adopted. The ratification of the Constitution was accomplished not by a single, national vote, but by the individual ratifications of the various states, each assembled in convention.

2) In the American system no government is sovereign. The peoples of the states are the sovereigns. It is they who apportion powers between themselves, their state governments, and the federal government. In doing so they are not impairing their sovereignty in any way. To the contrary, they are exercising it.

3) Since the peoples of the states are the sovereigns, then when the federal government exercises a power of dubious constitutionality on a matter of great importance, it is they themselves who are the proper disputants, as they review whether their agent was intended to hold such a power. No other arrangement makes sense. No one asks his agent whether the agent has or should have such-and-such power. In other words, the very nature of sovereignty, and of the American system itself, is such that the sovereigns must retain the power to restrain the agent they themselves created. James Madison explains this clearly in the famous Virginia Report of 1800.

Why Do We Need It?

As Jefferson warned, if the federal government is allowed to hold a monopoly on determining the extent of its own powers, we have no right to be surprised when it keeps discovering new ones. If the federal government has the exclusive right to judge the extent of its own powers, it will continue to grow – regardless of elections, the separation of powers, and other much-touted limits on government power. In his Report of 1800, Madison reminded Virginians and Americans at large that the judicial branch was not infallible, and that some remedy must be found for those cases in which all three branches of the federal government exceed their constitutional limits.

Isn’t This Ancient History?

Two dozen American states nullified the REAL ID Act of 2005. More than a dozen states have successfully defied the federal government over medical marijuana. Nullification initiatives of all kinds, involving the recent health care legislation, cap and trade, and the Second Amendment are popping up everywhere.

What’s more, we’ve tried everything else. Nothing seems able to stop Leviathan’s relentless march. We need to have recourse to every mechanism of defense Thomas Jefferson bequeathed to us, not just the ones that won’t offend Katie Couric or MSNBC.

Won't This Make the New York Times Unhappy?

More proof it's a good idea.

Doesn't Nullification Violate the Constitution's Supremacy Clause?

Thomas Jefferson knew about the Supremacy Clause, it's safe to assume. The Supremacy Clause applies to constitutional laws, not unconstitutional ones. For a full reply to this objection, see Professor Brion McClanahan.

Isn't This Just a Smokescreen for Slavery?

Nullification was never used on behalf of slavery. As I show in Nullification, it was used against slavery, which is why South Carolina's secession document cites it as a grievance justifying southern secession, and Jefferson Davis denounced it in his farewell address to the Senate. Thus Wisconsin's Supreme Court, backed up by the state legislature, declared the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 unconstitutional (the mere existence of the fugitive-slave clause in the Constitution did not, in its view, suffice to make all the odious provisions of that act constitutionally legitimate). In Ableman v. Booth (1859), the Supreme Court scolded it for doing so. In other words, modern anti-nullification jurisprudence has its roots in the Supreme Court's declarations in support of the Fugitive Slave Act.

Who's defending slavery here?

Water that is free from toxins is fundamental to good health.

Our society uses over 100,000 chemicals. Today, toxins contaminate every aspect of our environment.

"But," you may say, "my local government assures me that our water is safe."

Your tap water may be legally "safe" to drink, but it still could contain harmful chemicals.

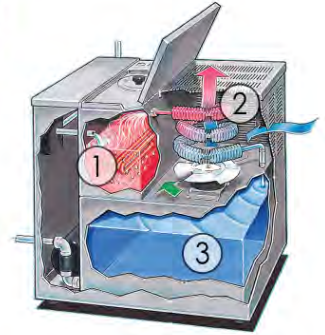

How can this be? Simple. The government uses the legal definition of the term "safe" drinking water, not the English language definition. Many toxins aren't regulated.

Distillation duplicates nature's water cycle to produce consistently pure water for decades. It's the single best method for removing contaminants from water.

Drink (and cook with) fresh, great-tasting, pure water for the rest of your life!

Should You Trust Google?

Did you know that Google installed a hidden microphone in their Google Nest device, and no one knew it until a security researcher examined the device 2 years after it was released? The sales material, terms of service and even their schematics mentioned nothing about it.

Did you know that Google lets hundreds of other companies look through your Gmail inbox?

Or that they track your Android phone location even if your locations services are off?

Every product that Google creates is a Trojan Horse that is specifically designed to steal your data. They want to gather as much information as they possibly can.

But why do they want to collect your data? Is it just to sell you more ads?

No. It's much more than this.

Information is power, and when they have information ABOUT you they have power OVER you!

They use your data against you. And tests reveal how powerful they are.

Simply by manipulating what order results show up when people do a Google search, Google has been shown to be able to adjust election outcomes by 37.1%, so if Google favors one candidate in an election, its impact on voters could easily decide the election's outcome.

And this is just one small way that they manipulate people. Google is also the largest censor of information in the world.

But here's an even harder truth: Big Tech IS Big Brother.

Surveillance is one of the biggest threats to liberty in our modern world. It's essential that you escape the surveillance state. The first step is to De-Google yourself. We have created a free PDF instructional booklet called, "De-Google Your Life." Click here to download it now.

Some creepy quotes from Eric Schmidt, the CEO of Google...

"If you have something that you don't want anyone to know, maybe you shouldn't be doing it in the first place.

"Facial recognition, completely unmonitored, can be used for very bad things.

"The policy is to get right up to the creepy line and not cross it.

"We know where you are. We know where you've been. We can more or less know what you're thinking about.
